treasures, and her process in committing them to a piece of artwork is as "rhythmic, persistent, and vulnerable" as is nature itself.

"The larger the drawing," said Kapp, "the more opportunity there is to experience the drawing from a distance and then, with closer scrutiny, the detail." The process of taking an image from a sketch to a finished piece "often leads us further than we imagined," Kapp said.

The process takes about four to six weeks of crosshatching and layering. "I experience a kind of addiction to the marking," said Kapp. "The creation of the art is a metaphor for nature's process and in nature, I find a metaphor for parts of life. Working or playing with organic subjects, the gestural line and the layering of color is the place I would like to be. It's in my nature to be comfortable there."

Samila Sosic's work is equally organic in nature.

"Observation and documentation of hummingbird flying patterns" is what inspired the pieces being exhibited by Sosic. In particular, "a fascination of non-verbal communication between flying partners" is the force behind the collection, which features large, bright abstract paintings on canvas.

"My intention was to embrace and present their graceful moves and striking beauty through elements of color, texture and movements," Sosic explains in her artist's statement. "By using bracketing photo references and transferring them into paintings, the hummingbirds started to perform their dances on my canvases."

But rather than directly tell viewers what she was seeing and recreating, Sosic said that she "left the curiosity of the viewer's eyes to create their own patterns and find the personal dance in each of my "BIRDS," which is the title of her show.
