In celebration of the Month of the Young Child, the Rouse Children's Center took its Pre-K class to the Warren Public Library to enjoy the artwork they created. This artwork was created around the theme of the children's favorite book titled, The Tiny Seed, by Eric Carle. Students were able to read the book, learn about seeds and create a group art project.

Crary collages...

and her boyfriend's cats will be the subjects of upcoming projects. Davis' show is titled "Fractured Views," given the process she uses of taking shards of magazine pages to recreate vivid, intricate moments in time. "You look at them from far away," said Davis, "and they just look like photographs but when you get right up close to them you can see all of the little pieces."

Lake Chautauqua is one setting that seems to repeat in Davis' work, as to nature scenes from right here in Warren, giving her show a local appeal. "I really like doing water, and the reflections of things in water," said Davis. Since she spends her summers at Chautauqua, she said she began collaging scenes from there as souvenirs and mementos.

Aside from being an artist, Davis is a long-term substitute teacher with the Warren County School District, as well as being active in community theater, civic orchestra, city council, and other local organizations. "She uses what leisure time she has remaining to capture more images with her camera and turn them into these small, yet complex, and textural works," said Paquette.

The show opens — along with Michel Varisco's "Neh'eh" — fro, 6 to 8 p.m. Saturday, April 22, with gallery talks scheduled for 7 p.m.
